History of Higher and Adult Education

The history of higher and adult education can be traced back to the earliest days of human civilization. In ancient Greece, the philosopher Plato founded the Academy, which was one of the first institutions of higher learning. In medieval Europe, universities were established in major cities such as Paris, Bologna, and Oxford. These universities were primarily concerned with the study of theology, law, and medicine.

In the 19th century, the Industrial Revolution led to a dramatic increase in the demand for higher education. New colleges and universities were founded to train workers for the new industrial economy. In the 20th century, the demand for higher education continued to grow, as more and more people sought to improve their job prospects and social status.

Today, higher and adult education is a global phenomenon. There are over 20,000 colleges and universities in the world, serving millions of students. Higher education is increasingly seen as a key to economic success and social mobility.
