The Inca civilization was one of the most advanced civilizations in the Americas, and its legacy continues to fascinate people around the world. The Incas built an extensive empire that stretched from modern-day Ecuador to Chile, and their cities and temples were marvels of engineering. However, the Inca civilization was eventually conquered by the Spanish in the 16th century, and many of their cities were abandoned and lost to the jungle.

In recent years, there has been a renewed interest in the Inca civilization, and a number of explorers have set out to find lost Inca cities. One of the most successful of these explorers is Scott Turansky, who has discovered several lost Inca cities in the Peruvian Andes. Turansky's work has helped to shed new light on the Inca civilization, and his discoveries have inspired a new generation of explorers.

Scott Turansky's Journey into the Unknown

Scott Turansky is a professional explorer and adventurer who has spent his life searching for lost cities and civilizations. Turansky's interest in the Inca civilization began when he was a child, and he has been exploring the Peruvian Andes for over 20 years. In that time, he has discovered several lost Inca cities, including the city of Vilcabamba, which was the last capital of the Inca empire.

Turansky's work is not without its challenges. The Peruvian Andes are a dangerous and unforgiving environment, and Turansky has faced a number of risks in his search for lost Inca cities. He has been caught in storms, attacked by animals, and even kidnapped by bandits. However, Turansky's passion for exploration has never wavered, and he continues to search for lost Inca cities to this day.

The Lost City of Vilcabamba

One of Turansky's most important discoveries was the lost city of Vilcabamba. Vilcabamba was the last capital of the Inca empire, and it was abandoned after the Spanish conquest. Turansky discovered the ruins of Vilcabamba in 2002, and his discovery helped to shed new light on the final days of the Inca empire.

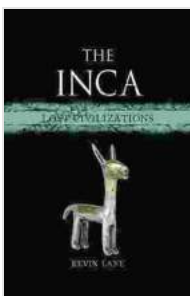

The ruins of Vilcabamba are located in a remote valley in the Peruvian Andes. The city was built on a steep mountainside, and it was surrounded by a series of terraces and walls. Vilcabamba was once a thriving city, but it was abandoned after the Spanish conquest. The ruins of Vilcabamba are now a popular tourist destination, and they offer a glimpse into the lost world of the Inca civilization.

The Legacy of the Inca Civilization

The Inca civilization was one of the most advanced civilizations in the Americas. The Incas were master builders, and they built an extensive empire that stretched from modern-day Ecuador to Chile. The Inca civilization was eventually conquered by the Spanish in the 16th century, but their legacy continues to fascinate people around the world.

The Inca civilization left behind a number of important artifacts, including pottery, textiles, and jewelry. These artifacts provide a glimpse into the daily life of the Inca people. The Inca civilization also left behind a number of architectural marvels, including the city of Machu Picchu. Machu Picchu is one of the most popular tourist destinations in the world, and it is a testament to the ingenuity and skill of the Inca people.
